

Article Title

First Author¹

Second Author²

LINK TO ABSTRACT

Begin the article here without an Introduction heading. State the question, explain why it matters, and summarize the article's contribution.

First Main Section

Develop the article's evidence or argument here. A textual citation makes the author part of the sentence: Friedman (1962) provides one example. A parenthetical citation places the source at the end of the relevant statement (Keynes 1936, Chapter 3). Use footnotes for substantive comments rather than source citations.³

Use the standard quote environment for a long quotation:

Replace this paragraph with quoted material. The class automatically applies EJW's indentation, type size, and line spacing, so no special quotation command is necessary.

Conclusion

Summarize the principal finding and its implications. The conclusion may also identify limitations or questions for future work.

References

Friedman, Milton. 1962. Capitalism and Freedom. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

¹ Department of Economics, University Name. Email: first@example.com.

² School of Social Science, Other University. Email: second@example.com.

³ This is an example of a substantive footnote.

Keynes, John Maynard. 1936. The General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World.

About the Authors

First Author is an economist at University Name. The biography should briefly describe the author's position, research interests, and selected publications.

Second Author is an economist at Other University. This second entry illustrates a biography without a portrait.